ROTARY HISTORY

From The Rotarian, September 1953.....Down in the peaceful countryside of lower North Carolina, the searing crosses of bigotry, like the fame and the moth, burned a lot of innocent people until two courageous Rotarian newspapermen turned loose the chilling stream of publicity to extinguish them.

The two men are Willard G. Cole, of Whiteville, and W. Horace Carter, of Tabor City, North Carolina. To them and their papers has recently come the proudest award in United States journalism, the Pulitzer Prize, for their outstanding community service in ridding Columbus County of the Ku Klux Klan. In shouldering their task, the two editors faced the very real possibility of terrorist reprisals on themselves and their families. The Klan in its history never hesitated to attack its opponents physically. Flogging, house burning, even murder, were its weapons against those who would oppose it.

Against this, Rotarians Cole and Carter pitted the lonely weapons of courage and the printing press. Operating a semi-weekly with a circulation of 5,000, Cole struck out broadly from Whiteville, the county seat; and Carter, editing and publishing a 1,700-criculation weekly, launched broadsides from Tabor City. They were threatened and their routine sources of information "clammed up." Information that would stand up in court was the prime need. The two openly attended Klan meetings and reported the events bluntly despite Klan warnings. They obtained evidence from reluctant victims.

Week after week the campaign continued. Finally, the "grand dragon" was convicted, floggers were arrested. The remnants slunk away. Decent people, sparked by the leadership of their newspapers, reasserted themselves to say, "This thing shall stop."

Edward R. Murrow brought his cameras to Whiteville and Tabor City to film his major television show, "See it Now." Ed Murrow turned his cameras also on a special Rotary club meeting honoring the two men.
